

The laws which regulate psychic affairs can be pursued as well and probably better from the other side of the veil.

True Ghost Stories

By Sir Arthur Conan Doyle

Illustrated by W.T. Benda

The Christchurch Vault The Hearse Horses of Ahrensburg

IT is safe to say that for some centuries to come the human race will be very actively engaged in defining the laws which regulate psychic affairs, and it is fortunately a line of study which has the peculiar advantage to those who indulge in it, that they can pursue it just as well, and probably better, from the other side of the veil.

At present there is work lying to hand for a hundred investigators. The innumerable records which exist in various forms, and which are now scattered throughout papers, magazines, reports of learned societies and family traditions are like masses of ore which have been extracted from the ground but are still lying in dumps waiting to be separated into precious ingots on the one side and slag-heap on the other. They have to be examined, collected into classes, reviewed in the light of our ever-increasing knowledge, and an endeavor made to find underlying principles running through this vague collection of matter, so that at last we may touch solid ground by getting hold of some elementary laws.

The first thing is that we should have authentic cases, so that the foundation of our reasoning may be sound.

The second is to compare these authentic cases together and see what common characteristics they possess, shirking nothing and following the facts wherever they lead without any preliminary prejudice.

This is of course the true scientific fashion, but it is unfortunately one which has been neglected by most scientific men in approaching this new subject which would not fit in with their preconceived ideas.

Let us hunt among these fascinating problems for shards and splinters out of which a noble mosaic will one day be constructed, and let us see whether here and there we may not find two or three pieces which fit together, and give some idea of a permanent pattern, even though it be a fantastic one.

I will begin by telling three stories which seem to be absolutely authentic and then we shall endeavor to trace some underlying connection.

The Vault at Christchurch

FOR full particulars of the first case the reader is referred to "West Indian Tales" by Algernon Aspinall, with the explanation that the word "Tales" group within. During the month there seems to have been no disturbance.

In September, 1816, four years having elapsed, the vault was opened once more to admit an infant, Samuel Anes. Once again all was in horrible confusion, and the coffins littered across one another. The affair was now becoming a scandal, and the talk of the whole settlement—the whites putting it down to vandalism and the negroes to ghosts. Once again the vault was closed, and once again, two months later, it was opened to admit one Samuel Brewster. Crowds followed the coffin and gathered round the vault when the great slab was pushed aside.

In the short interval everything had again been disarranged, the coffins being shamefully mis-handled. Mrs. Goddard's coffin, which seems to have been of wood, was broken, but this may have been natural decay. The leaden coffins were scattered at all angles.

Once again they were reverently collected, the wooden coffin was tied up, and the vault secured.

THREE years later, on July 31st, 1819, Miss Clarke was to be buried in the vault. So great was the public excitement that the Governor, Lord Combermere, of Peninsular fame, attended the ceremony with his staff and aides-de-camp. Things were so bad as ever. The wooden coffin was intact, but the others were scattered in all directions. Lord Combermere was so interested that he had the whole structure searched and sounded, but there was no hidden approach or underground passage. It was an insoluble mystery.

The coffins were rearranged, and the floor carefully sanded, so that footprints would be revealed. The door was cemented up, which seems to have been done on each occasion, but this time the Governor affixed his own particular seal. The British Government had officially entered the lists against the powers of darkness.

It is humiliating to add that the Powers of Darkness seemed not in the least abashed by the Governor or by the Empire which he represented. Next year, in April, 1820, it was determined that an official inspection should be made without waiting for a fresh interment. Lord Combermere, with a formidable official party and a strong ally in the Rev. T. Order-son, Rector of the parish, repaired to the vault, where is not used in the sense of inventions and that the facts are authentic, as is proved by numerous references in the narrative. These facts relate to the singular series of events which happened in connection with the vault at Christchurch near the village of Obstin on the south coast of Barbados.

In the old slave days when rum and sugar were the foundations of many a goodly fortune, things were done on a larger scale in the West Indies, and this burial vault was a very fine one. It was made of great blocks of coral and cement, partly sunk into the earth, for the grave-yard was on an exposed hill, and terrific storms sweep over those latitudes. The entrance was then covered by a huge slab of marble.

Within, the dimensions of the vault were twelve feet by six and a half.

So Cyclops was the masonry and so remote the site that one would imagine an inmate was almost as secure as a king of Egypt in the heart of his pyramid. A contractor and a gang of skilled workmen would be needed to effect an entrance into so solid a construction.

Little did those who erected it imagine that the whole island would be convulsed by the repeated proofs of its insecurity.

In July, 1807, a Mrs. Goddard was buried therein, and her coffin was found undisturbed in February, 1808, when a child named Mary Chase was laid in a leaden casket beside her. For years the vault was closed, but on July, 1812, it was opened to admit a Miss Dorcas Chase. The horrified workmen found the coffin of the infant standing on its head in a corner. It was supposed that some mischievous and sacrilegious wretch had been guilty of a senseless outrage; so after the coffin was rearranged the great marble slab was once again placed in position, to be opened next month when a Mr. Chase joined the family the seals were found intact and all in apparent order. The cement was then broken and the slab removed by the exertions of ten negroes, who had the utmost difficulty in forcing an entrance. On exposing the interior, it was found, to the horror and amazement of the party, that the difficulty in opening the vault had been caused by the fact that a leaden coffin within, so heavy that several men could hardly move it, had been jammed upside down against the slab. There was great confusion within, but no marks upon the sand which covered the floor. So horrified was everyone by this final test, that the bodies were now removed and buried elsewhere. The empty vault remains, and is likely for many centuries to remain, as a refuge for snakes or centipedes, upon the lonely headland which overlooks the Atlantic.

To the horror and amazement of the workmen, the leaden coffins were scattered at all angles.

What is one to make of such a story as that?

The facts seem to be beyond question. Are there any points which are particularly to be noted from a psychic point of view, in the hope that the germs of law may lie within? One is that the antiquity of these unseen forces was aroused apparently by the leaden coffins. When the wooden coffin was alone it was not molested. Its decay seems to have been natural, and when it was tied up it was not again disturbed. If it ever received any injury, it may well have been from the weight of the ponderous leaden coffin which were dashed about around it. That is one possible point. A second and more important one is, that all psychic phenomena seem to show that the disembodied have no power of their own, but that it is always derived from the emanations of the living, which we call animal magnetism or other names.

Now, this vault with its absolutely air-tight walls, was particularly adapted for holding in such forces—being an exaggerated form of that cabinet which is used for that very purpose by a genuine medium. If the walls of cloth of a cabinet can contain these emanations and condense them, how much more the solid walls of this vault. To bring in these weighty leaden coffins, the space must have been crowded with overheated negroes; and when the slab was at once hermetically sealed, these effluvia were enclosed and remained behind, furnishing a possible source of that material power which is useful for material effects. These are two points worth noting before we pass on to determine if any such cases may fall into line with this one.

We have not far to seek, for one is quoted in the very book under discussion, with a reference to the European Magazine for September, 1815, under the heading: "The Curious Vault at Stanton in Suffolk." In the magazine account, it says: "On opening the vault some years since, several leaden coffins with wooden cases that had been on biers, were found displaced to the great astonishment of many. The coffins were placed as before, when some time ago, another of the family dying, they were a second time

LIKE masses of ore already extracted from the ground, but still lying in dumps ready to be separated into previous ingots on the one side and slag heaps on the other, are innumerable records—in papers, magazines, family traditions—from which will come to be defaced the laws that regulate psychic affairs. Let us hunt among these fascinating problems for shreds and splinters out of which a noble mosaic of a permanent pattern will one day be constructed.

found displaced. Two years later, they were found not only all off the biers, but one coffin, as heavy as to require eight men to raise it, was found on the fourth step that leads into the vault." There, unhappily, the information ends. It tallies very closely with the West Indian case so far as it goes, but is far weaker as regards the evidence and the details. I have made inquiry from the present Vicar of the parish, but have been unable to improve either the one or the other. The statement that the phenomenon occurred twice and the precise information as to the situation of the coffin upon the fourth step of the stair, seem to remove the story from vague rumor, and to show that it was based upon some actual fact.

The Hearse Horses of Ahrensburg

THE next case, however, is fuller and more circumstantial. It comes from the Livonian village of Ahrensburg in the Baltic, and remote as the scene is, the evidence is well attested. There is a considerable cemetery in the village, which is dotted with small private chapels, each of them with a family burial vault beneath it. The finest of these belonged to a family named Buxhoeveden, which faced the public high road, and contained certain posts to which the horses of the farmers used to be haltered when the owners were occupied in the town. The first signs of anything peculiar lay in the behavior of these creatures which showed such symptoms of terror that they attracted the notice of passers-by. They were covered with sweat, trembled all over, and in three cases actually died from the violence of their emotion. At the same time, certain loud but vague sounds were heard to come, either from the chapel or from the vault beneath it.

These portents were in the early summer of the year 1844.

In July, a member of the Buxhoeveden family died, and the hearse horses on approaching the cemetery, showed the same signs of terror as the others. The service in the chapel was interrupted by hollow groans, which may have been imagined by a congregation who were already predisposed to alarm. What was not imagination, however, was the fact that those who afterward descended into the vault, found the coffins there, which had been in rows, cast into a confused heap upon the wooden floor. These coffins seem to have been of massive oak, very strongly and heavily made. This might have been the work of some enemy to the family, but the doors of the vault had been secured and the locks were intact. There was always the possibility of false keys, however, so the coffins were replaced in their order, and the place very carefully secured.

As the agitation of the horses and the general unrest of the community still continued, the chief man of the district, Baron de Guldenstube, took up the matter officially, and so the Russian government found itself involved in the same one-sided contention from which the Governor of Barbados had gained so little satisfaction. With two of his family, he made a preliminary examination, and then finding the coffins once again in confusion, he formed a committee of investigation consisting of himself, the local bishop, the Burgomaster, a physician named Luce, and four representative citizens.

ON entering the vault, they again found that the enemy had been at work, and that the contents were scattered in all directions. Only three coffins, those of a very saintly grandmother and two little children, were undisturbed. Attempted robbery was suggested as an explanation, which was the more plausible as an adjoining vault had once been entered and some gold fringe taken from the coffins. But nothing was now missing, nor was there any means of entrance. The Committee pursued its research with great care, even to the point of opening some coffins to see if rings and trinkets buried with the owners were still within. It was found that this was so. Workmen were then called in to examine the floor and the walls, but no possible secret entrance could be discovered.

Everything was now closed up once more, and the disconsolate Committee withdrew, after placing heavy seals upon the door. Before leaving the vault, fire ashes were scattered all over the wooden floor, and also over the steps leading down, and the pavement of the chapel. Finally, guards were set for three days and nights. It must be admitted that they did things thoroughly in the village of Ahrensburg. At the end of that time the Commission returned in full state, with the whole population lining the churchyard rails, eager to hear the results.

The seals were unbroken, the door unopened, but the interior of the vault was in (Continued on page 74) the usual state of chaos. No sign at any point was found upon the ashes, and so human feet had entered, but great forces had, more the less, been at work.

True Ghost Stories

(Continued from page 23)

The secret powers, reinforced rather than subdued by the recent visit of the Commission, had wrought far greater mischief than before.

All the coffins were scattered, save the same three which had been exempt before. Some of the heaviest had been placed upside down, so that the corpse was on its head and in one instance the lid had burst, and the right arm of the inmate, who was a man who had died by his own hand, was protruding and pointing towards the ceiling.

Such was the forlorn spectacle which greeted the Commission. They were duly noted in a detailed report, and are still to be consulted among the official records of the Island of Oesel, with the names of the witnesses attached.

It is also on record that the effect upon the mind of Dr. Luce, who was a man of considerable attainments, and a Voltairian in religion, was a complete change of mental outlook and that revulsion from materialism which any actual contact with the spiritual world, must logically produce.

THE result of these gruesome phenomena was, that the coffins were removed from the vault and were buried in earth, after which complete tranquility seems to have descended upon the little village. Not only were there no disturbances to vex the population, but the horses were observed to occupy their old stance without terror.

Apart from the official record, Mr. Duke Owen, who was American Minister to Naples, and a man of great intelligence, met Miss de Goldenstabelle and her brother in 1870 and took their personal recollections of the whole matter. It is from his work that I have taken these details.

No doubt many such cases could be recorded, but here at least, are three which appear to be authentic, and which reproduce the same characteristics.

If relics of some strange animal were found in three different localities, the first conclusion among men of science would be that such an animal did exist, and was henceforth to be included among the creatures of earth.

The next proceeding would be to compare the relics and to endeavor to reconstruct some image of the newcomer.

In the same way, these three cases may be said fairly to establish the fact of these curious phenomena which involve the desecration of graves—a fact which, however gruesome, does at least strike at the very roots of that material view of life which has been so fashionable.

IT has already been stated that one or more living people in a confined space which is afterwards closed up, may leave behind them something human and yet invisible, which is sufficiently subtle to be used by forces from the other side as a basis for material phenomena.

All movements of solid objects, touched or un touched, in the presence of a medium are to be explained in this fashion, and the force may be expected to be stronger when confined within a limited space.

LET us suppose that in the case of each of these three vaults there was an accumulation of this mysterious, but very certain power, left behind by the coffin-bearers, and possibly reinforced by the committees of inquiry, who would have been very amazed had they been told that they were in all probability themselves contributing to the phenomena.

Then, I think, you have the physical basis which is necessary for every spiritual manifestation, for it cannot too often or too clearly be insisted upon that spirits are not omnipotent and irresponsible forces, but that they are under a rule no less strict than our own.

One of these laws is that a physical basis is needed for every physical manifestation. We may find in the future some non-human basis, for it is conceivable that some subtle chemical action could be established which would generate this magnetic force, just as zinc and acid generate the kindred mystery of electricity.

But a physical basis there must be.

No ghost was ever self-supporting.

He can exist without our help, but he cannot manifest to human eyes without drawing his material from human (or possibly animal) sources. That, so it seems to me, is one of the laws of the new world of science.

THERE is some evidence which could be cited in full if it did not lead us down a lonely side street, that when a life has been cut short before it has reached its God-appointed term, whether the cause be murder or suicide (of accident I speak with less confidence) there remains a store of unused vitality which may, where the circumstances are favorable, work itself off in capricious and irregular ways.

This, I admit, is a provisional theory, but it has been forced upon my mind by many

FINALLY, the question arises—what was the object of such phenomena? We see that the result in at least two cases out of three was, that the dead were buried elsewhere.

Apparently for some reason, the earth burial may have been desired instead of the seclusion of the vault.

It would certainly hasten the absolute de-

She saw a table remain in the air, although four men tried to drag it down.

considerations, and especially by an inquiry which I conducted myself where a series of childish and apparently senseless physical phenomena ended in the discovery of the body of a child in the adjacent garden.

Such a theory would go some way to explain, or at least to throw some dim light upon, the disturbances which from all past time have been associated with scenes of violence and murder.

If it could be conceived that the unseen part of a man is divisible into the higher, which passes on as spirit, and the lower which represents animal functions and mere unused vitality, then it is this latter which has not been normally worked off in a life prematurely ended, and which may express itself in strange semi-intelligent fashion afterwards.

In dreams, one is conscious of some such division where the higher functions occasionally bring us back touches of the most spiritual, while the lower functions, deprived for the time of judgment, humor, and all the spirit qualities, evolve a capricious and grotesque life of their own, which has neither reason nor sense of proportion, and yet seems very real to us in our slumbers.

It is not a subject upon which one could be dogmatic, but the days are passing when all such cases can be disposed of by being brushed aside and ignored as superstition.

Some sort of framework must be formed into which they can be fitted, and with fuller knowledge the fit will be closer.

composition of the body, if that should be good from the point of view of the other world.

This seems a far-fetched supposition, and one very much at variance with the belief of those numerous nations who have practised the art of embalming and corpse-preservation, but if this was not the object of the disturbance it must be admitted that it is difficult to see what other result was attained, save a very compelling proof of unseen intelligence and powers.

If a speedy decomposition was the object aimed at, then the leaden and heavy caskets would check the process which would be swifter in the more fragile ones. This might conceivably explain the particular violence which seems to have been used towards the more permanent materials.

Perhaps, however, no line time in searching for rational explanations since there is ample evidence that there can be no doubt beyond the veil as well as here.

ONE remark should be made before passing on to another form of ghostly manifestation. It has been said that the basis for physical results lies in the human organism.

It is not meant, however, that there is any relation between the small amount often taken from the medium and the great physical results obtained. It is clear that the unseen forces can get great power from a limited supply of this subtle material.

In the case carefully observed and noted by Professor Zoller of Leipzig, a barn of wood which two horses could not have dragged apart was shattered into pieces in the presence of Shades. A friend of mine who was present at a meeting of the Gallegos circle, saw a table ascend in the air, and remain there, although four strong men did all they could to drag it down.

It is true that in a sitting of this sort the medium, Miss Goligher, frequently registered a loss of weight, amounting to a stone in a session, upon the weighing dial which Dr. Crawford had erected; but it is clear that the force exerted by the unseen powers was very much greater than this and was due to her manipulation of the material which her organism had provided.

In some of the sittings of D. D. Home, the force was so great that the whole building used to shake as if a heavy train were passing below it.

AND here comes one of the mysteries which bear directly upon that definition of spirit law which is so desirable.

In spite of the possibility of using vast power, there is a clear, and so far as credible records go, an unbroken ordinance that a ghost may not for its own personal ends destroy anything or injure anyone.

This may seem in contradiction to the broken coffins, but that may not have been for personal ends, but an accident due to the falling about of heavy weights.

Here is an authentic case in illustration.

A great friend of mine, a Roman Catholic priest, whose word could not be doubted by anyone who knew him, was sent for a rest cure to a lonely house upon the coast which was frequently used by other priests for the same purpose. Save for an old woman and one or two charitable visitors, he was absolutely alone.

After a few days, he became conscious of strange noises in the house, which at last reached a point that, to quote his own description, "it sounded at night as if there were a steam-engine and jangling in the room below."

Nothing was visible, but the sounds were incessant and were heard by two visitors as clearly as by the inmate. The priest is himself open, more than most men, to psychic impressions, and upon that night he had a dream or vision which was so absolutely clear that he determined to act upon it.

He descended in the morning and asked the old woman whether there was not an unused room in the basement.

She answered that there was.

He entered it and found that he had already seen it in his dream—a small, dusty, cubbyhole place, with some old books of theology heaped in the corners. He walked at once to one of these heaps, picked up a book, as in his dream, opened it, took out a sheet of written paper, glanced at it to make sure that it was really as revealed, and then carried it into the kitchen, where he stuffed it between the bars of the grate.

The paper was a written preparation for confession, made out by some over-conscientious or over-methodical inmate of the house, who had noted down a good many more things than were desirable for public perusal. Presumably he had died shortly afterwards, and had been worried by the recollection of this document, which he had taken these means to have destroyed.

There was no further disturbances of any sort within the house.

NOW, here is a story which is undoubtedly true, and which cannot be met by any of the ingenious explanations of the honest, but skeptical, researcher.

If the subconscious knowledge of my friend could have told him that the paper was there, it certainly could not have caused the noises which alarmed him. It has to be examined as a fact, as the anatomist already quoted, would examine the skin of his raw animal.

The unhappy spirit could apparently draw power either from the old house-keeper, or, as is more likely, from the young, and psychic priest to shake the very house with vibrations and yet with all this power he could not destroy a frail sheet of paper, but had to bring its destruction about in this indirect fashion.

This seems to be a solid and noteworthy conclusion. All authentic tales where spirits linger earth-bound because they appear to be worried over earthly things, concerned treasure, lost documents or other such matters, come into this category, and the question which one naturally asks, "Why can't they set the matter right for themselves?" is answered by, "They have not the power. It is against the law."